ABSTRACT

A novel heterogeneous pumice supported perchloric acid catalyzed synthesis of tetrahydrobenzo[b]pyran has developed via multi-component condensation of aromatic aldehydes, dimedone and malononitrile. The catalyst was characterized by IR, XRD, EDS, SEM, and TGA techniques which confirmed the formation novel pumice supported perchloric acid. The present protocol proved to have numerous advantages like one-pot reaction, good yield, short reaction time, inexpensive catalyst, recyclability and reusability of the catalyst, simple experimental and work up procedure, and purification of targeted molecules without column chromatography.

Introduction

In the last two decades, volcanic pumice and pumice based materials have been employed in divergent organic transformations such as reduction reaction, oxidation reaction, photo catalytic degradation, multi-component condensation reaction and also water treatment process. These varied reactions are achieved because large silica content of the pumice which was converted into active catalytic material. The appreciable advantages of pumice supported catalytic materials are heterogeneous nature, good surface area, excellent catalytic activity, thermal stability, high porosity, high absorption capacity, recyclability and reusability, etc.^{1–9}

Multi-component reaction (MCR) approach has gained excellent impact in the discovery of heterocyclic compounds due to the synthetic efficiency and economy. The MCR strategy is a one step synthetic operation with incredibly well-designed and quick approach to discover highly functionalized and complex biologically active molecules. It has also advantages like high flexibility, high atom economy and high selectivity.^{10–12} The synthesis of tetrahydrobenzo[b]pyrans is also an important illustration of the multi-component reaction.

The tetrahydrobenzo[b]pyran derivatives are extremely significant to the organic chemists because of their prominent biological and pharmacological activities. They are fascinating poly-functionalized compounds which possess a wide variety of biological activities like anti-allergic, antibacterial, anti-coagulant, anti-tumor, calcium channel antagonists and diuretic etc. Along with biological activities, some derivatives of tetrahydrobenzo[b]pyran have been employed as photo-active materials and agrochemicals. They are also used in cosmetics and pigments.^{13–18} The some illustration of biologically active tetrahydrobenzo[b]pyran derivatives shown in Figure 1.

ABSTRACT

In the present investigation, new heterogeneous catalyst pumice supported sulfonic acid (pumice@SO₃H) was prepared from natural pumice by simple agitation with chlorosulphonic acid. The catalytic performance of a pumice@SO₃H was investigated for the synthesis of 2,4,5-triaryl imidazoles and acridine-1,8-diones under microwave (MW) assisted solvent-free condition. The pumice@SO₃H was stable and exhibits a good Brønsted acidic character. The beneficial characteristic features observed with this protocol are the recyclability of catalyst, the solvent free approach, the applicability to a wide variety of substrates, good to excellent yields, and easy to use. The catalyst pumice@SO₃H with MW has been increased the green chemistry value of this method.

1. Introduction

Pumice is a naturally occurring volcanic material which has attracted attention due to various outstanding features associated with it such as high abundance, cheaply available, high porosity, large surface area, light weight and non-toxic nature. The presence of a high percentage of silica and a good number of hydroxyl groups makes it suitable as a backbone to develop new heterogeneous solid acid catalysts. The pumice supported materials have been employed as heterogeneous catalysts in numerous organic transformations (Yuana et al., 2012; Venezia et al., 2001; Alver et al., 2016; Deganello et al., 2000). Due to the presence of huge numbers of hydroxyl groups, Pumice has been converted into several active catalysts such as acidic (Maleki et al., 2020), nano-composites (Valadi et al., 2020), and metal supported catalyst (Liotta et al., 2001; Duca et al., 1995). This volcanic pumice material has also been used as adsorbents (Bekaroglu et al., 2010) and as photo catalysts in the water treatment (Rao et al., 2003).

The microwave assisted reactions is a well established green, and the minimum time consuming path used for the synthesis of a number of N-heterocycles by MCRs. The microwave protocol provides a clean, efficient, quicker, simple and powerful dielectric heating for the construction of complex heterocyclic compounds (Ahankar et al., 2016; Shirole et al., 2017, 2018; Mullassery et al., 2018; Bhatt et al., 2018; Magyar and Hell, 2019; Ulus et al., 2016; Zhu et al., 2017; Alirezvani et al., 2019).

The multicomponent reactions (MCRs) have fascinated exceptional protocol for one pot synthesis of diverse heterocyclic compounds. The interesting characteristic features of MCRs are their high atom economy, synthetic efficiency, single operation, and simplicity (Aute et al., 2020; Bienayme et al., 2000; Harikrishna et al., 2020; Naeimi and Didar, 2017; Kiyani and Ghorbani, 2015; Alinezhad et al., 2020; Thwin et al., 2019). The synthesis of 2,4,5-triarylimidazole (Maleki et al., 2015), and acridine-1,8-diones (Yu et al., 2017) are provides the significant illustrations of multicomponent reactions. The imidazole and 1,4-dihydropyridine scaffolds are the important class of heterocyclic compounds, exhibit promising biological and pharmaceutical activities (Gong et al., 2016; Weinstein et al., 2007; Trommenschlager et al., 2017; Takle et al., 2006; Gunduz et al., 2014; Periyasami et al., 2019; Bhosle et al., 2020; Naouri et al., 2020; Joubert and Kapp, 2020; Jamalian et al., 2011) and also found as a core in various natural products (Fig. 1). Some imidazole derivatives are also used in the preparation of ionic liquids which have played a dual role in synthetic organic chemistry as a catalyst as well as solvents (Alinezhad et al., 2017; Nejatianfar et al., 2018; Nguyen et al., 2019; Shirole and Shelke, 2016).

The imidazole and pyridine based ligands shows a strong coordination capability and resourceful coordination sites (Guo et al., 2013). They display the properties such as luminescence and gas adsorption (Chen et al., 2014; Li et al., 2018), luminescence and magnetic properties (Li et al., 2020), thermal and solid-state fluorescence, anion sensors
